

Hydration for our Aging Bodies

For many, grandparents are a major support system. They have watched us grow up. Many grandparents stepped in to raise their grandchildren. They teach their grandchildren new things and accept them when others have not. Which is why we need to protect them at all costs.

As we age, our bodies do not function as they used to before. The aging process can affect the body's organs, tissues, cells, etc. The ability of organ function at the age 20 versus age 65 is vastly different. For instance, a person in their youth may be able to handle a high intensive workout or process junk food fine. Meanwhile, an elderly person may not be able to consume junk food or get their heart rate pumping at a fast rate. Of course this can vary person to person but overall everyone begins to lose reserve ability to function beyond the usual needs.

Due to these conditions the body is put under, senior citizens need to be aware of what they put into their bodies. And they should know the best methods to take care of themselves.

So how can we help our loved ones?
